Abstract

This writing is aimed at critiquing ethical and professional relationships between researchers and participants in qualitative research. Reflections and notes of a researcher are explored to point out the complex relationships in a qualitative research. The reflections and notes of the researcher was based on her relationships with the HIV patients who participated in the research. The final discussion concludes on the importance of the Rogerian concept (Rogers, 1999) in developing the ethical and professional relationships between the researcher and the participants.
